Fielding Graduate University, School of Educational Leadership & Change—
California Association for Bilingual Education (CABE) Doctoral Cohort Proposal

Fielding Graduate University, School of Educational Leadership & Change, proposes to establish a doctoral cohort in California by working cooperatively with the California Association for Bilingual Educators (CABE). California’s population is among the most ethnically and linguistically diverse in the nation, and there is a demand for high-quality educators to prepare students well beginning in early childhood education through higher education (K–22). However, California’s K–12 principals and administrators and teacher-education faculty are reaching retirement age at an increasing rate. As a result, the supply of teacher-education faculty and K–12 educators with specialized expertise in leadership, biliteracy, and multiculturalism has not kept pace with the demand for their expertise. Establishing a Fielding-CABE doctoral cohort will help prepare the next generation of educational leaders to meet this demand and build a pipeline of highly qualified educators for the future.

The Educational Leadership & Change doctoral program is designed to prepare educators who are equipped to serve in preschools, K–12 schools, and institutions of higher education experiencing demographic and linguistic change in local communities. Through action research, project-based learning, appreciative inquiry, and research methods connected to communities of practice, the program is positioned to make foundational contributions to solving growing challenges confronting K–22 education.

The Fielding-CABE doctoral cohort will be composed of a minimum of fifteen doctoral students with educational interests in the areas of leadership, biliteracy, and multiculturalism from throughout California. The Fielding’s doctoral program cohort model is designed to be completed in three academic years. Fielding will provide a substantial scholarship for Fielding-CABE doctoral cohort students resulting in approximately a 25% tuition savings for three academic years. Applicants must have previous experience teaching English learners from diverse linguistic backgrounds and must have demonstrated leadership potential in K–22 education or a non-profit educational setting.

To develop doctoral students’ leadership capacity and effect change in their local communities, the Fielding-CABE doctoral cohort students will share their developing expertise in leadership, biliteracy, and multiculturalism at CABE professional development sessions; conduct presentations at the annual CABE conference; or serve in a leadership role of a regional CABE chapter. Doctoral students will also prepare to serve in leadership roles in their K–22 or non-profit professional setting.
